Abstract

The polyhedral mechanism of language communication is presented as an ideal combination result that is based on the human sensory stimulations and the cognitive embodiments of experienced reality. In this way simple or complex phraseological structures significantly characterized by psycho-intellectual elements with specific (literal) or abstract (metaphorical) semantic background are formed. This paper harmonized with the primary principles of Contrastive Linguistics follows the conceptual method. It focuses on a clear study of synonymous idiomatic units whose structural component is the lemma “language / tongue”. At the same time, it tends to the essential highlight of the equivalent elements and the differentiated nuances noticed in Modern Greek and two Slavic languages, namely Russian and Serbian. The examined material which is exclusively defined according to the qualitative criterion of frequency comes from monolingual and bilingual, general and phraseological dictionaries.

Key words: tongue, phraseme, Greek, Russian, Serbian

Résumé

Le mécanisme polyédrique de la communication linguistique est présenté comme un résultat de combinaison idéale basée sur les stimulations sensorielles humaines et les incarnations cognitives de la réalité vécue. De cette manière, des structures phraséologiques simples ou complexes sont significativement caractérisées par des éléments psycho-intellectuels avec un arrière-plan sémantique spécifique (littéral) ou abstrait (métaphorique). Cet article, en harmonie avec les principes fondamentaux de la linguistique contrastive, suit la méthode conceptuelle. Il se concentre sur une étude claire des unités idiomatiques synonymes dont le composant structurel est le lemme « langage / tongue ». Dans le même temps, il vise à mettre en évidence les éléments équivalents essentiels et les nuances différencierées observées en grec moderne et dans deux langues slaves, à savoir le russe et le serbe.

Le matériel examiné, exclusivement défini selon le critère qualitatif de la fréquence, provient de dictionnaires monolingues et bilingues, généraux et phraséologiques.

Mots-clés: tongue, phrasème, grec, russe, serbe

A. Basic features of the research (subject – goal – corpus – method)

The main subject of this contrastive linguistics paper covers the phraseological units in Modern Greek and in two genetically similar Slavic languages (Russian and Serbian). Its constituent components are the lexemes “γλώσσα” (Greek), “језик” (Serbian) and “язык” (Russian).

The conducted analysis aims at the clear identification of the literal and metaphorical conceptual mechanisms by which Greek, Russian and Serbian native speakers usually interpret various relationships, surrounding phenomena and ordinary actions, while lexicalizing them through interesting idiomatic expressions.

From descriptive and phraseological, monolingual and bilingual dictionaries we primarily selected characteristic multi-word expressions in order to find their matching parameters and typical diverging points from a lexical-semantic point of view. According to the above-mentioned considerations this attempt cannot be characterized as a complete trilingual review of set phrases.

Using the method of contrastive analysis we deal with the corresponding corpus, which contains a total of five hundred and four (504) lexical units: one hundred and forty-five (145) idiomatic phrases belong to Greek; two hundred and twenty-six (226) idioms come from Russian; one hundred and thirty-three (133) phrasemes are excerpted from Serbian.

B. Contrastive study of phraseological units

In our comparative approach to established multi-morphemic utterances Modern Greek functions as the source language. The role of the target languages is played by Russian, an East Slavic representative with worldwide distribution and a dominant member of the South Slavic group, i.e. Serbian.

For a more comprehensive consideration of the presented phrasemes we add explanatory indications (G = Greek; R = Russian; S = Serbian; M = meaning; ~ = literal translation). Additionally, the Greek idioms are accented and transcribed in accordance with the International Phonetic Alphabet.

On the basis of their commonly accepted semantic framework, we have classified the idiomatic phrases into seven subcategories:

I. Speaking activity

C. Concluding remarks

On the basis of the conducted comparison, in which the excerpted examples in Russian are significantly more (Russian: 226; Greek: 145; Serbian: 133), we can draw the conclusion that Grecophones, Russophones and Serbophones tend toward an extremely equal conceptualization of relations, phenomena and activities marked by semantic nuances of phraseologisms with constituent lexemes “language” or “tongue”.

The historical development of human civilization, the geographical closeness, and the cultural syncretism between the Greek, Serbian and Russian people lead to cross-linguistic typological connections. Actually, they emphatically show that in the examined languages these universal language features are used with limited distinction. In parallel, basic Proto-Slavic parameters function as the common denominator of Russian and Serbian, while explaining the emergence of similar conceptions and the formation of synonymous linguistic units.

However, we must point out that intercultural stereotypes and stylistic nuances of metaphors are manifested in very interesting differences that reflect the complexity of the cognitive framework and the individual aspects of linguistic behavior as well.

Finally, it is obvious that multi-word lexical units describing the tongue as a primary means of speech practice appear as a dominant subgroup (288 examples = 141 Russian; 75 Serbian; 74 Greek). In terms of frequency, idioms denoting the result of thought processes and sentimental states (58 examples = 20 Greek; 19 Russian; 19 Serbian), while the fixed expressions illustrating non-communicative activities (53 examples = 27 Russian; 18 Greek; 8 Serbian) follow. The set expressions motivated by a separate code of certain social groups occupy the fourth place (37 examples = 13 Greek; 13 Russian; 11 Serbian). Paralinguistic types (26 examples = 9 Russian; 9 Greek; 8 Serbian) and objects whose external form is associated with language (24 examples = 8 Russian; 8 Serbian; 8 Greek) are represented by an almost identical number of phrasemes. The least number of phraseologisms (18 examples = 9 Russian; 5 Greek; 4 Serbian) refers to the flexible muscular organ.
